Markets appeared to be calmer this week after last week's tariff excitement. Mills continue to try to hold quotes higher, but activity was lean, and most mills and secondaries reported that it had gotten quieter as the week went on. Trump announced a policy on reciprocal tariffs on Thursday afternoon, causing futures markets to dip again. This new policy may put some immediate concerns to bed for a while. Meanwhile, winter weather continues to choke off activity in many regions. Look for mills to continue the bullish behavior until order files are upon them. They don't have deep files in most cases. Short term could see markets softening, but every day is a new surprise it seems. Football season is over and we are still a ways from March Madness. Good time to binge watch Real Housewives of the Construction Industry.
